

Where America Stands

2024 SURVEY RESULTS

Americans overwhelmingly recognize and value the First Amendment, but worrisome trends show gaps in understanding and appreciation of its freedoms of religion, speech, press, assembly and petition.

The First Amendment: Where America Stands is an annual survey conducted by Freedom Forum to grasp Americans' knowledge, understanding and perspectives on the First Amendment. This year, Freedom Forum surveyed 820 Americans in July and August to both test understanding of and measure affinity for the freedoms guaranteed by the First Amendment. Analyzing many of the same questions Freedom Forum has asked for years, we can understand not only what Americans know and think about the First Amendment, but also measure trends—in how those metrics are changing Freedom Forum has been devoted to fostering First Amendment freedoms for all since 1991.

THE FIRST AMENDMENT

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Executive Summary

In 2024, heading into a tightly contested election, Americans are overwhelmingly unified in their awareness of the First Amendment, including a majority who say it is a relevant issue for them as they head to the polls in November.

However, there are indications that support for the First Amendment is declining.

Fewer Americans say they would ratify the First Amendment today if it were up to them, down five points from four years ago. Moreover, Americans are 15% less likely to be able to identify freedom of religion and the press as rights within the First Amendment, and the number that said the five freedoms within the First Amendment are essential decreased from 41% to 34% in that time. And there are indications that generationally, younger Americans have a declining affinity for the First Amendment.

The right of the people peaceably to assemble.

Campus protests in 2024 seem to have complicated Americans' views on the First Amendment and freedom of assembly.

Six in 10 Americans (61%) agree that college campuses should foster a free exchange of ideas, even if they are offensive to some. This is a decrease from 69% just last year. Interestingly, Gen Z participants are less likely to agree with that statement than other generations.

Nearly three-quarters of Americans (72%) feel that a peaceful protest is fine, but encampments and taking over campus buildings goes too far.

Top Line Numbers

Nine in ten Americans say they believe The First Amendment is vital (93%).

Baby boomers, white respondents and those with incomes between $60K and $100K hold this belief higher compared to Gen Y, respondents of color and people with incomes either under $60K or over $100K.

Just over three-quarters of respondents strongly or somewhat agree that they understand how the First Amendment affects their everyday life (77%).

- Gen X and boomers agree more than younger respondents.
- Those with income below $60k are less likely to agree than those with income over $60k.

(96%) Overwhelmingly, Americans say they're aware of the First Amendment

Nearly two-thirds (63%) of Americans believe that the First Amendment should never be changed.

This is most true among men, baby boomers and white respondents.

Despite strong claims of awareness and understanding of the First Amendment, less than half of Americans can correctly identify all five freedoms. Nearly three in ten say public schools should be required to post the Ten Commandment on classroom walls—which is already the subject of a federal court case. More than a third say preventing hate speech is more important than protecting free speech—though hate speech is protected by the First Amendment.

Trends

An increasing number of Americans (over six in ten) in 2024 believe the First Amendment shouldn't be changed. This is up by ten percentage points since four years ago, when only five in ten said so.

While an overwhelming majority (96%) of Americans can correctly identify at least one right guaranteed by the First Amendment—indicating that basic First Amendment literacy is strong, this number is slightly down from 98% in 2020, and Americans' ability to correctly identify specific freedoms (particularly religion and the press) has declined in the past four years.

Worryingly, a declining share of Americans say they would ratify the First Amendment today if it were up to them. (58% today, down from 63% four years ago).

The First Amendment Matters in the 2024 Election

The First Amendment looms large in Americans' minds as they consider the 2024 election, even as worrying trends indicate waning literacy and appreciation for the freedoms of religion, speech, press, assembly and petition.

2024 Election and the First Amendment

More than half of Americans say their concerns over the First Amendment will impact how they vote this November.

Americans in the Northeast are more likely (at 60%) to say the First Amendment is relevant to their decision this fall than those in the Midwest (49%).

While the First Amendment is on most Americans' minds as they head to the polls, their attitudes and perceptions of the candidates with respect to First Amendment rights are as divided as with any issue.

Just shy of one-half of Americans (49%) consider Donald Trump to be either “a strong threat” or “somewhat of a threat” to the First Amendment, as compared to 37% who consider Kamala Harris to be either “a strong threat” or “somewhat of a threat” to their First Amendment freedoms.

About one-third (36%) of Americans consider Trump to be a “protector” of First Amendment freedoms, compared to 42% who view Harris that way.

2024 Election and the First Amendment

Americans further stand divided on their perception of the candidates and First Amendment rights by age, region, race and income.

Americans in the Northeast are more likely to view Trump as a threat to First Amendment rights than those in the South, while perceptions about Harris are considerably more consistent regionally.

Baby boomers are more likely than younger generations to perceive Trump as a threat to the First Amendment.

Black respondents are more likely than other Americans to perceive Trump as a threat to the First Amendment, while white respondents are more likely than other races to consider Harris a threat to the First Amendment.

Percentage of respondents who consider Trump as a threat to the First Amendment.

Percentage of respondents who consider Harris as a threat to the First Amendment.

While middle-income Americans ($60K-$100K) are the most likely income segment to perceive Harris as a threat to the First Amendment, affluent Americans (income over $100K) are the most likely to perceive Trump as a First Amendment threat.

Misinformation and the Press

More than 70% of Americans say they're extremely or moderately concerned about misinformation in the 2024 election.

Generationally, baby boomers stand out as the most concerned about misinformation, though at least 66% of every generation reported concern over misinformation.

Americans are divided over the issue of how to address election-related deepfakes. One-third would support requiring notices identifying deepfakes, 29% would support banning election-related deepfake videos altogether, and 23% say nothing should be done.

Most Americans (56%) continue to believe that it's important for the news media to be a watchdog on government. Fewer (41%) believe that the news media can help ensure a fair election, while 30% say it cannot and nearly as many aren't sure.

Worrisome Trends

Freedom Forum has been tracking Americans' relationship with the First Amendment for decades. Americans are as aware as ever that the First Amendment exists, with 96% saying they have heard of the First Amendment. The ability to correctly name at least one of the rights guaranteed by the First Amendment) is also holding steady at approximately 96%.

It's encouraging that Americans are aware of the First Amendment and are thinking about it as they head to the polls. However, worrying trends are emerging in the data as well:

Americans are less likely to identify freedom of religion and freedom of press as rights guaranteed by the First Amendment.

- Americans' ability to correctly identify freedom of religion as a freedom protected by the First Amendment dropped in 2024 to 62%, a 17% decline from 2020 numbers.
- Similarly, Americans' recognition of freedom of the press as a First Amendment right dropped 15% to 57% in 2024.
- Americans' correct recognition of all five freedoms has declined in the past four years, and recognition of freedom of petition remains in the minority at 41%.

96% of Americans say they have heard of the First Amendment.

And 96% of Americans can correctly name at least one of the rights guaranteed by the First Amendment (Aided).

While Americans are holding steady at about 93% saying the First Amendment is vital, a declining share feel that all five First Amendment freedoms are essential. Today, one-third (34%) of the country says all are equally essential, down from 41% four years ago.

Concerning rifts are growing in the country as appreciation for First Amendment freedoms—historically a national unifier—is increasingly segmented by age, race, and class.

Baby boomers, white respondents and those with moderate incomes (between $60k and $100k) are all statistically more likely to say that the First Amendment is vital compared to Gen Y, respondents of color and those with both higher and lower incomes.

Also concerning: Generationally, Americans are becoming more likely to agree with the statement, “The First Amendment goes too far in the rights it guarantees.” Only 10% of baby boomers agree, as compared to 17% of millennials. Millennials also stand out as being statistically more likely than both boomers and Gen X to agree with the statement, “The First Amendment goes too far and should be amended.”

More than a third of Americans say that preventing hate speech is more important than preserving free speech. Four in ten say such speech should not be protected.

Furthermore, a declining share of Americans say they would ratify the First Amendment today if it were up to them. Only 58% of the country says they would approve the First Amendment today, down from 63% four years ago.

While not strictly a First Amendment issue, most Americans say they don’t feel they can speak freely about controversial topics, for fear of job loss, a violent response, perceptions about them or tensions with friends and family.

The First Amendment protects hate speech. Should it?

More than a third (42%) of Americans feel hate speech should not be protected.

Campus Speech and Assembly

Campus protests in 2024 seem to have complicated Americans' views on the First Amendment and freedom of assembly.

- Nearly three-quarters of Americans (72%) feel that a peaceful protest is fine, but encampments taking over campus buildings goes too far.
- Nearly half (49%) say campuses need to crack down on protests because they undermine education and make students feel unsafe, but 21% disagree and 30% weren't sure.
- Though not specific to campus protests, half (51%) say that organizers of a protest or demonstration should be held liable if violence occurs, regardless of who caused the violence.
- Six in 10 Americans (61%) agree that college campuses should foster a free exchange of ideas, even if they are offensive to some. This is a significant decrease from 66% just last year. Gen Z participants continue to agree with this statement at a significantly lower rate than other generations.
- Interestingly, the topic of campus protest may have raised (some) literacy around First Amendment issues. Nearly half (45%) realize the First Amendment treats public and private universities differently, as compared to only 23% who understand that the First Amendment doesn't apply to private institutions.

Religion in Public Life

Religion is consistently the second-most known and valued among First Amendment freedoms, after freedom of speech. Among First Amendment freedoms, 13% say religion is most essential, consistent with results dating to 2020.

Awareness of each freedom, including religion, has decreased since 2020, with 61% able to identify religion from a list compared to 73% in 2020.

Fewer Americans (21%) say they do not feel they can speak freely about religion compared to higher proportions who say they cannot openly discuss gender (27%), abortion (24%) or race (23%).

Just over half of Americans (54%) say that Christian values should not get more protection than other faiths. About three in 10 (27%) weren't sure, and 18% said Christian values should be more protected than other faiths. Baby boomers were most likely to say Christian values should be especially protected, as were white, Asian and higher-income respondents.

Religion in Schools

When it comes to displaying the Ten Commandment in classrooms, 29% of Americans say public schools should be required to do so while 45% say they should not. (A new law in Louisiana requires the Commandments be displayed in classrooms). White respondents and lower-income respondents were least likely to agree with displaying the Ten Commandments in classrooms.

Half of Americans (51%) say that tax dollars should not fund religious schools, while 20% said religious schools should be publicly funded.

Social Media

Social media represents a complicated arena for free speech and is an area where Americans are most unaware of their First Amendment rights—and the most ready to give them up.

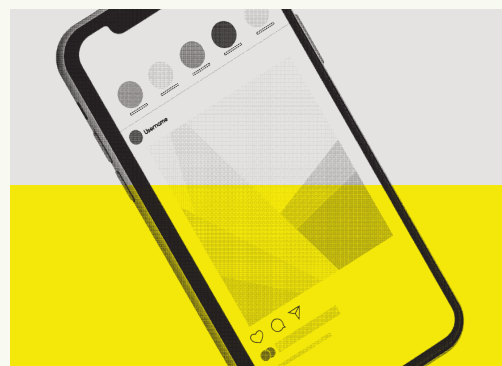

Notably, perspectives on social media and the First Amendment divide sharply by generation. Only 29% of Gen Z respondents say governments should have the power to ban individual social media platforms if they believe there is a threat to national security. The percentage of baby boomers who say so is nearly double that (57%).

AGREE

About one-third (31%) agree that public school teachers should be punished for controversial posts on their personal social media accounts. 37% of respondents disagree and 32% don't know.

About half of Americans agree that:

- People under 16 should be restricted from social media access unless they have parental permission (54%).
- The government should have the power to ban individual social media platforms if they believe there is a threat to national security (46%).

The primary objective for this research was to understand where America is in 2024 on key questions concerning the First Amendment.

- In 2024, the research was completed online with 820 respondents in the United States.
- Qualified respondents completed a 12-minute questionnaire.
- Data collection was conducted from July 29 - August 5, 2024.

All respondents met the following qualifications:

- Aged 16+
- Live in the U.S.
